

Published as: St. Thomas Aquinas on Satisfaction, Indulgences, and Crusades, in: Medieval Philosophy & Theology 2 (1992): 74-96.

ST THOMAS AQUINAS ON SATISFACTION, INDULGENCES, AND CRUSADES: QUODLIBETAL QUESTION II, Q. 8, A. 2

I. Introduction

In order properly to elucidate the Church's doctrine on indulgences, the theologian must relate the practice of granting indulgences to the satisfaction of Christ and to the penitential works undertaken by Christian believers.¹ In his treatment of indulgences, St Thomas Aquinas is concerned to explain how Christ's redemptive sufferings can spiritually benefit the members of the mystical body. Aquinas understands that, through indulgences, the Church allots certain spiritual benefits to those who collaborate by one means or another in building up the mystical body.² In his view, then, the theology of indulgences simply develops the general theological axiom that one person can share according to some determined measure in the good deeds of another individual. To put it differently, as much as Christians ought to pray for and help one another, indulgences are a way of giving concrete expression to the communion of saints.

Aquinas undertakes a broad, multi-disciplinary study. Besides analyzing the nature of indulgences, he also illustrates their connection to the sacrament of reconciliation, defines the proper authorities for granting indulgences, and examines the necessary conditions for gaining an indulgence.³ In the course of these discussions, Aquinas gives clear evidence that he appreciates how the 13th-century Church had made canon law a principal means of establishing pastoral care. But since his theological project is not restricted simply to questions of jurisprudence and pastoral practice, Aquinas normally discusses such issues, including the canonical aspects of indulgences, within the broader contexts of soteriology and ecclesiology; as a result, his conclusions throw more than historical light on the meaning of an indulgence. For a complete appreciation of St Thomas's doctrine, two texts in his theological corpus merit special attention.

Published as: St. Thomas Aquinas on Satisfaction, Indulgences, and Crusades, in: Medieval Philosophy & Theology 2 (1992): 74-96.

The principal places where St Thomas deals with the theology and practice of granting indulgences include: (1) Scriptum super libros Sententiarum IV, d. 20, q. 1, aa. 3-5 and (2) Quaestiones de quolibet II, q. 8, a. 2. To be sure, the editors of the Supplementum to the Summa theologiae assembled three questions on indulgences, but St Thomas himself finished writing the Summa in December 1273, viz., before he was able to confront the question of indulgences within the original framework of the Summa.⁴ Furthermore, these two ex professo discussions belong to different periods in Aquinas's career. They also represent different literary genres. In his "writings" on the Sentences of Peter Lombard, which Aquinas composed at Paris between 1252-1256, we recognize a systematic treatment from the pen of a young theologian. But the Second Quodlibetal Question, recorded at Paris around 1270, gives us an insight into how the seasoned university professor handled the subject in open debate. In addition, the Second Quodlibetal Question, q. 8, a. 2, evidences a certain evolution of theological perspective which, according to the opinion of some, marks Aquinas's thinking during the second half of his academic career.⁵

Although I take into account pertinent material from the earlier treatment in the Scriptum super libros Sententiarum, the text of Second Quodlibetal Question, q. 8, a. 2 serves as the principal focus for this study. I also refer to Aquinas's teaching on merit and satisfaction, especially his developed doctrine in the Summa theologiae.⁶ Still, the brief exposition in Second Quodlibetal Question incorporates many of the basic theological principles which Aquinas considers indispensable for a comprehensive understanding of indulgences.⁷ The crusading indulgences, as we shall see, affords him the occasion for articulating a theory concerning the place which indulgences occupy in the Church's sacramental economy.

As a principal element of his analysis, Aquinas employs a traditional metaphor. He speaks about the spiritual treasure-chest which contains the good works of Christ and the saints: the thesaurus ecclesiae.⁸ Even if such language represents an unwieldy metaphor for Christ's charity, St Thomas nonetheless clearly distances himself from both mercantile views of redemption and physicalist interpretations of grace. In brief, he does not consider indulgences as a spiritual deposit and withdrawal system for building up heavenly merits—like so much interest in a bank account.⁹ Indeed, we can uncover no justification in Aquinas's theology for the well-known abuses of the later Middle Ages, especially the so-called sale of indulgences by professional "pardoners." One might even argue that if Aquinas's theological finesse in treating indulgences had shaped the practice of the Church in the 16th century, indulgences might not have been one of the issues that occasioned the Protestant Reform. For Aquinas consistently demonstrates that indulgences form an integral part of the Church's mission to communicate both the merits of Christ's sacrifice and his satisfaction to those who believe in the truth of the Gospel.

Published as: St. Thomas Aquinas on Satisfaction, Indulgences, and Crusades, in: Medieval Philosophy & Theology 2 (1992): 74-96.

II. Historical Background: Paris, 1269-1272

The historical circumstance which links granting indulgences to the Church's promotion of the Crusades serves as background for Second Quodlibetal Question, q. 8, a. 2. Aquinas inquires whether a crusader who dies before he sets forth for the Holy Land, and thereby escapes the hardships and duress of fighting the infidels, actually gains a full remission of his sins.¹⁰ As a matter of historical record, the Church formally began the practice of granting plenary indulgences as part of her strategy for popularizing the Crusades.¹¹ Admittedly, the exact nature of the promise which Pope Urban II made at the Council of Clermont (1095) remains a matter of dispute among medieval historians. Nevertheless, the record appears to show that the Pontiff promised remission of all penitential practices incurred by the crusaders provided they confess their sins.¹² In an important study, Maureen Purcell points to a difference between the language allegedly used by Urban II at Clermont, "a full remission of enjoined penance," and that of the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215 which promises a "full remission of sin."¹³ In any event, we can suppose that a certain confusion between what an indulgence accomplished and what constituted the actual remission of sins enveloped popular views on these matters.¹⁴

Published as: St. Thomas Aquinas on Satisfaction, Indulgences, and Crusades, in: Medieval Philosophy & Theology 2 (1992): 74-96.

Whatever Pope Urban's true intentions may have been, the fact remains that until the 13th century developments in the doctrine of indulgences were almost wholly implicit in theological teaching on the sacrament of penance. By that time, theologians generally understood indulgences as supplying for the satisfactory works which ordinarily form part of the sacramental discipline. In the tertia pars of the Summa theologiae, written shortly after the Second Quodlibetal Question, St Thomas explains that contrition, confession, and satisfaction are suitably designated as the parts of penance.¹⁵ Indeed, penitential works, such as prayer, fasting, and almsgiving, all of which can serve as works of satisfaction, gradually rectify the psychological disorders which result from a person's sinful actions. Even in his Scriptum super libros Sententiarum, Aquinas introduces his treatment of indulgences towards the end of the tract on the sacrament of penance.¹⁶ A century earlier, however, the Master of the Sentences did not consider the topic of indulgences important enough to include in his 12th-century compilation of standard theological arguments, the Sententiarum libri quattuor (1155-1158). Still, the connection between the sacrament of penance, works of satisfaction, and indulgences remains an important one for appraising correctly the practice of granting indulgences in the 13th century.

Since physical participation in a military campaign inevitably involves certain personal hardships, such an enterprise easily could serve as a sort of satisfaction for sins. Accordingly, inquiries such as that posed in the Fifth Quodlibetal Question, q. 7, a. 2 (held in Paris at Christmastime, 1271): "Whether a crusader who dies on the way to the Holy Land dies in a better state than one who dies on the return trip?" or in Second Quodlibetal Question, q. 8, a. 2: "Whether a crusader who dies before he can take the journey across the sea has full forgiveness of sins?" formed a normal part of medieval discussions. Although today such queries may at first seem arcane, they nonetheless permit Aquinas to discuss a range of issues related to Christian satisfaction. For example, Aquinas turns again and again to the merits of Christ himself, the meritorious works of the saints, the meaning of the thesaurus ecclesiae, the purpose of satisfaction in the Christian life, and the conditions which permit one to gain an indulgence.

Published as: St. Thomas Aquinas on Satisfaction, Indulgences, and Crusades, in: Medieval Philosophy & Theology 2 (1992): 74-96.

The quodlibetals report open question and answer sessions set aside for the benefit of medieval university communities. At Paris, such quodlibetals were held only during Advent and Lent—perhaps the exercise was considered penitential for the magistri. Palmeon Glorieux argues that this type of unprecedented public discussion first came to be used at Paris in the Mendicants' schools, probably during the student strike of 1220-1231.¹⁷ In any event, scholars usually date the Second Quodlibetal Question from the beginning of Aquinas's second Parisian Regency (1269-1272).¹⁸ In the article presently under consideration, St Thomas entertains the question whether a crusader who dies before undergoing the hardships of fighting the infidels actually benefits from the crusading indulgence.

Perhaps the question was not purely hypothetical. In fact, the second article may reflect an earnest concern for the French Church of the middle 13th century. We know that the French king Louis IX came back from his first crusade in 1254. After an unsuccessful campaign, during which he had been imprisoned for about a month, he returned disappointed over the results of his labors. The very next year, Louis had to dispatch a company of royal archers to protect the Dominican convent from the Parisian crowds because they had been turned against the newly-arrived mendicants by partisans of the secular masters. These latter strongly opposed sharing university privileges with the friars. Despite this antagonism generated by established members of the Parisian intellectual community, Louis remained a strong supporter of both the Franciscans and the Dominicans. And according to William di Tocco, the king especially liked brother Thomas Aquinas.¹⁹

Published as: St. Thomas Aquinas on Satisfaction, Indulgences, and Crusades, in: Medieval Philosophy & Theology 2 (1992): 74-96.

Can we suppose that St Thomas had his royal patron in mind when responding to the question: How does an indulgence affect one who has not had the chance to endure in his own person the hardship for which the indulgence had been granted? Historical grounds exist for thinking that he did. For in 1267, with events in the East growing worse for the Christian community, Louis IX once more took the cross. But in little more than a month, after setting sail from Aigues-Mortes in July 1270, the king died in Tunis. Admittedly one commonly accepted date for the Second Quodlibetal Question is Christmastime, 1269. Still, scholars recognize that the dating of certain quodlibetal questions remains only probable; for example, F. Pelster asserts that the Second Quodlibetal Question was actually held at Christmastime in 1270.²⁰ Accordingly, it seems quite reasonable to suggest that the fate of the French king had indeed raised interest in the relationship between the remission of punishment and the actual endurance of a stipulated penalty for sin, to the extent that at the very next quodlibetal session, a certain student might well have posed the question to magister Thomas Aquinas.

As I have already noted, the plenary indulgence gained prominence in the Church's practice as a result of the objective to recover the Holy Land. The crusading decree, Ad liberandum, of IV Lateran in 1215 presents a clear statement of the cause for receiving the plenary indulgence. It is important, however, to note the exact terms of the ecclesiastical decree. The document promises full pardon of repented sins properly confessed to "all who in their own person shall undergo this burden [of the Crusade] at their own expense" (omnibus qui laborem istum in propriis personis subierint et expensis).²¹ This decree, in turn, formed the basis for two subsequent documents, Afflicti corde (First Council of Lyons, 1245) and Zelus fidei (Second Council of Lyons, 1274).²² We can assume that Aquinas was aware of the first two decrees. In any case, his quodlibetal text does acknowledge that there exists a littera papalis promising full remission of the punishment due to past sins for those who are willing to undertake the hardships and dangers of a medieval crusade.

Published as: St. Thomas Aquinas on Satisfaction, Indulgences, and Crusades, in: Medieval Philosophy & Theology 2 (1992): 74-96.

III. The Theological Argument

Still, certain questions remain: What does it mean to affirm that a member of the Church obtains a remission of the punishment due to sin? How can the Church substitute punishment for sin with the hardships of a military campaign? And what theological grounds exist for making such a claim within the Christian Church? In order to discover his answers to these questions, we must now turn to a close examination of Aquinas's text.

3.1 Arguments

First of all, Aquinas presents four arguments: two of which support the thesis that a dead crusader receives the promised indulgence even if he never reaches the Holy Land and two (the so-called sed contra arguments) which offer reasons for thinking otherwise. Each of these four arguments, of course, suppose the traditional threefold elements of sacramental reconciliation: contritio cordis; confessio oris; satisfactio operis. Judged from one point of view, indulgences constitute commutations of satisfactory works attached to particular deeds, such as, prayers, pilgrimages, or other burdensome actions, including the risky and painful undertaking of military combat. Accordingly, the indulgenced deed, the necessary condition of the indulgence, theoretically accomplishes the same good in the sinner which otherwise would have been brought about by the sacramental penance or satisfaction.

The first two arguments represent what we might call the juridical point of view. The first opening argument points out that the canonical requirements for gaining an indulgence have been met once the crusader has fulfilled the stipulated conditions. What are these requirements? The text mentions two. First, the crusader must confess his sins with true contrition, and second, the indulgence must come from the pope, who alone has jurisdiction over the punishment involved. If these conditions are fulfilled, the suddenly deceased crusader should benefit from the indulgence.

Published as: St. Thomas Aquinas on Satisfaction, Indulgences, and Crusades, in: Medieval Philosophy & Theology 2 (1992): 74-96.

1. For anyone to receive an indulgence, it suffices, as stipulated in the papal letter, that he be truly repentant and that he confess his sins. But a crusader who dies before he leaves for the Crusade has fulfilled all those things set forth by the official document in order to receive a plenary indulgence for sins. Therefore he does receive it fully.

2. Furthermore, only God forgives the offense of sin. When the pope, therefore, gives a plenary indulgence, this is not to be referred to offense but only to the totality of punishments. Now according to the stipulations of the papal document the one who accepts the crusader's cross will not suffer punishment for his sins. Thus, he will escape punishment immediately, having achieved the full remission of sin.²³

These arguments appraise the disorder of sin as something marginal to the psychological capacities of the human person. So, in order to adjust the punishment due to sin, the Church must supply nothing more than the proper legal formality. As a purely legal convention, an indulgence absolves the guilty party from whatever penalty he or she stands liable to suffer.

In other words, the two affirmative arguments simply propose that in order to gain the indulgence it suffices that one possess true interior contrition for past sins and have confessed these sins to the priest. Moreover, in accord with the terms of the papal letter, the actual indulgence results from accepting the crusader's cross. In other words, on the assumption that God alone forgives sins (what the scholastics referred to as "culpa"), the pope simply grants remission of sin's punishment (what the scholastics called "poena") to those willing to accept the burdens of a crusade. All in all, these two arguments clearly consider the punishment due to sin as a juridical reality over which the pope holds authority in the same way that an appellate judge can commute the punishment meted out to a convicted prisoner.

The second set of arguments takes up the question from another point of view, one which reflects the standard Augustinian teaching on sin as a deformation of the image of God which remains to some extent even in the baptized. In particular, the second sed contra argument raises the parallel case of forgiveness within the sacrament of reconciliation. In this sacrament, the person who confesses and displays sorrow for his or her sins receives absolution from the offense of sin through the ministry of the priest. Still, the tradition also holds that the penitent remains bound to satisfactory works which must be accomplished either during this life or in purgatory. In brief, satisfaction readies one to see God.

Published as: St. Thomas Aquinas on Satisfaction, Indulgences, and Crusades, in: Medieval Philosophy & Theology 2 (1992): 74-96.

1. Augustine says in Book XV of the De Trinitate that to take out the arrow is not the same as to heal the wound: the arrow of sin is removed by the remission of sin; the wound, however, is cured by the restoration of the image [of God], which satisfactory works alone accomplish. But the crusader who dies before he undertakes the actual Crusade has undergone nothing for the restoration of the image. Therefore, the wound is not yet healed; and thus he would not enter glory immediately without suffering the punishments of purgatory.

2. Furthermore, any priest uses these words: "I absolve you from all your sins." If therefore the dead crusader escapes all punishment for sin, by the same token anyone who receives absolution from a priest should also. This, however, would be unsuitable.²⁴

The first of these arguments especially provokes Aquinas to interpret indulgences from a personalist standpoint. Since sinful actions disregard the in-built teleologies of human nature, sin affects the psychology and character of the whole person. Only a sort of remedial discipline can re-direct human energies towards virtuous activity, that is, fully heal sin's metaphorical wounds. Can Aquinas supply a theological explanation which demonstrates why the practice of granting indulgence does not involve an inconsistency with this notion of sin? In other terms, how does an indulgence respect the fact that sin represents something more than the simple infraction of a divine rule or the breach of moral conventions?

As I have explained, a particular theology of sin controls Aquinas's approach to this matter. Sin conforms our psychological powers to purposes which fall short of incarnating God's goodness in the world. Since this sinful deformation implies disordered attachments to created goods, conversion entails satisfactory works. In fact, satisfaction finds its explanation in the human need for reordering our appetites towards morally good objectives instead of bad ones. This alone accomplishes the restoration of the original godly and godward image in the human creature.

Published as: St. Thomas Aquinas on Satisfaction, Indulgences, and Crusades, in: Medieval Philosophy & Theology 2 (1992): 74-96.

To put it differently, the contrary arguments do not suppose that God assigns punishment for sin after the manner of a courtroom proceeding. Rather, the punishment due to sin arises from the very nature of sin itself. As St Augustine reminds us, the effect of every disordered action remains its own punishment. Appropriately, St Thomas cites Augustine's text from the XV Book of the De Trinitate: "non est idem abstrahere telum, et sanare vulnus." He interprets this to mean that it is one thing to forgive sin, or, according to the metaphor, to remove the arrow, and another thing to heal the wounds caused in our human character by sin. This latter process, the restoration of the image of God in man, can only come about as a result of spiritual discipline. And Aquinas ascribes this task to works of satisfaction. Now, the crusader who dies without performing the equivalent of such satisfaction has not undergone the purgation required for one to behold the face of God.

Furthermore, the deceased crusader, according to the second argument of this set, does not seem to be in any different position from the ordinary Christian who receives sacramental forgiveness. And it would be unfitting to infer from the case of the unfortunate crusader that satisfaction held no place in the scheme of Christian conversion and renewal. However, if the forgiven sinner or the indulgenced crusader were excused from all of sin's poena, this would imply that the restoration of the imago Dei occurs without human effort or personal commitment.

3.2 Theological Principles

In the body of the text, Aquinas begins to establish the theological basis for granting a commutation of the rectification which works of satisfaction ordinarily accomplish in the repentant believer. First, he enunciates a basic principle of Christian soteriology, namely, that one person can satisfy for another. Christ accomplished precisely such a work. So Aquinas begins:

Published as: St. Thomas Aquinas on Satisfaction, Indulgences, and Crusades, in: Medieval Philosophy & Theology 2 (1992): 74-96.

For the resolution of this question, it should be noted, as was said above, that the work of one person can be satisfactory for another, whom the doer's intention designates.

But Christ shed his blood for the Church, and did and underwent many other things, which are to be judged of infinite value by reason of the dignity of [his] person. Thus it is said in the book of Wisdom, 7:14 that in it "there is infinite treasure for men." Likewise all the other saints had the intention in those things which they suffered and did for God that such would be for the well-being not only of themselves, but for the whole Church.²⁵

The notion that the quality of the person directly affects the value of whatever sufferings he undergoes finds its antecedent in certain provisions of Roman law. Because of the sovereign dignity of Christ's personhood, Christ's work, one can argue, possesses a kind of infinite value. In a way similar to the argument of St Anselm in Cur Deus homo?, Aquinas applies the principle here to account for the universal efficacy of Christ's passion. Or, as the canonical scriptures express it, Christ died "once for all" (Hebrews 7: 27).

Next, Aquinas argues that all Christians can participate in this spiritual good insofar as they form one Body in the Church. Although the good deeds of the saints possess such a value only insofar as they themselves remain united with Christ, the personal actions of Christ and the saints are said to constitute the thesaurus ecclesiae, the treasury of the Church. In order to concretize this notion, however, Aquinas recalls the canonical rule that the one who presides over the universal Church on earth possesses authority to dispense this treasury to all those who remain united in the same bond of charity. In accord with the traditional terminology, Aquinas refers to the authority of the Petrine Office as the "power of the keys."

Therefore, dispensation of this treasure belongs to the one who is in charge of the whole Church; hence the Lord gave to Peter the keys of the kingdom of heaven (Matthew 16, [19]). Accordingly, when either the well-being or absolute necessity of the Church requires it, the one who is in charge of the Church can distribute from this unlimited treasure to anyone who through charity belongs to the Church as much of the said treasure as shall seem to him opportune, either up to a total remission of punishment or to some certain amount. In this case, the passion of Christ and of the other saints would be imputed to the member as if he himself would have suffered whatever was required for the remission of his sins, as happens when one person satisfies for another, as has already been explained.²⁶

Published as: St. Thomas Aquinas on Satisfaction, Indulgences, and Crusades, in: Medieval Philosophy & Theology 2 (1992): 74-96.

The union in charity forms the ultimate ground for the possibility of sharing in the good works associated with Christ and the saints. When Aquinas speaks about imputation, he rather intends the sort of loving communication among the members of the Church which forms them into quasi one person.²⁷ In a certain manner of speaking, indulgences serve as a way of formalizing the participation by one member of the Church in the good works of another member.

Accordingly, whether it is a total remission of the punishment due to sin or only a partial remission of the same, the beneficiary of an indulgence relies on the sufferings of Christ and of the saints as if he himself had undergone the same suffering for sin. As Aquinas puts it in question 7, article 2 of the same Second Quodlibetal Question: ". . . all who are in charity are like one body, and just as the hand is devoted to the whole body and likewise to any member of the body, so the good of one redounds to all."²⁸ Aquinas argues that charity, which represents the highest perfection that a human person can achieve, and the ecclesial bond which it generates are to be considered of greater significance in establishing the grounds for indulgences than the requirements that strict justice would impose.

Aquinas can now resolve the question of the crusader who dies before he reaches the Holy Land. First, he summarizes the three canonical conditions for receiving an indulgence: (1) that the work involve a cause pertaining to the honor of God or the needs of the Church; (2) that it be established by a duly constituted authority; and (3) that the one who receives the indulgence already enjoys that union of charity in which the whole reality of the Church consists.

For an indulgence to benefit anyone, however, three things are required.

First, a cause which appertains to the honor of God, or for the necessity or utility of the Church. Secondly, authority in him who grants it: the Pope principally, others insofar as they receive either ordinary or commissioned that is delegated power from him. Thirdly, it is required that the one who wishes to receive the indulgence should be in the state of charity.

And these three things are designated in the papal letter. For the appropriate cause is designated in that one is sent forth to help the Holy Land; the authority in that mention is made of the authority of the apostles Peter and Paul, and of the pope himself; charity in the recipient, in that it is said: "to all truly sorry and confessed." It does not say, "and to those who have satisfied:" because the indulgence does not excuse from contrition and confession, but does take the place of satisfaction.²⁹

Published as: St. Thomas Aquinas on Satisfaction, Indulgences, and Crusades, in: Medieval Philosophy & Theology 2 (1992): 74-96.

The medieval canonists freely incorporated elements of moral and dogmatic theology into their various efforts to organize the administration of the Church.³⁰ As the above text makes clear, the canonical outlook even governed such strictly theological topics as divine charity, Christian satisfaction, and the Petrine Office.

Second, Aquinas replies to the actual case by insisting on a close reading of the terms given in the papal letter. On the one hand, if the text mentions the actual undertaking of the crusade, as is the case in the decrees of 1215 and 1245, the dead crusader does not gain the indulgence. On the other hand, if the mere intention to go on crusade (votum itineris) constitutes the condition, then the dead crusader has fulfilled what is required.

So, for the question proposed: if according to the provisions of the papal document the indulgence is granted to those taking the cross for a military expedition to the Holy Land, the crusader immediately gains the indulgence, even if he should die before he actually leaves for the Crusade. In this case, of course, the condition for the indulgence remains a vow to go and not the actual undertaking itself. If, on the other hand, in the phrasing of the document it is stipulated that the indulgence should be given to those who actually cross the sea, the one who dies before he makes the crossing, has not fulfilled the condition for the indulgence.³¹

At this point in the discussion, Aquinas establishes that he is conversant with the pertinent canonical legislation and that these legal distinctions do play a role in his theological judgment about how indulgences work.

In the case of the live crusader, we can easily understand how one who actually endures the hardships of the Crusades qualifies for the indulgence. For example, in Quodlibetal Question V, q. 7, a. 2, composed after the text presently under consideration, Aquinas simply affirms that the crusader who dies upon returning from the Crusade, all other things being equal, dies with greater merit than he would have had before experiencing the hardships because such a one has personally endured the difficult undertaking. At the same time, he acknowledges that from the point of view of the moral nature of the action, to go on a crusade is more meritorious than merely to return from one.³²

Published as: St. Thomas Aquinas on Satisfaction, Indulgences, and Crusades, in: Medieval Philosophy & Theology 2 (1992): 74-96.

But Aquinas also undertakes the more difficult case of explaining why the crusader who dies on route to the Holy Land can benefit from the indulgence. How can a merely juridical act, even one issued by the competent authority and fulfilled according to stipulations set down in the papal brief, serve to ready a soul for beatitude? Elsewhere Aquinas explains that the purification of a soul by the punishment of purgatory constitutes nothing else than the expiation of the guilt of punishment required for entering glory.³³ Given the presuppositions of St Augustine, the individual who has not undertaken such a purification cannot see God because the sinner's personal dispositions remain disproportioned with respect to divine beatitude. But how can an indulgence change our psychological dispositions?

In order to follow Aquinas's reasoning, we need to recall that the general principle for sharing in the spiritual goods of another differs depending on whether we are talking about a case of merit or of satisfaction. Since it directly entitles a person to a reward, merit remains incommunicable. On the other hand, the members of the Church can share works of satisfaction. Just as a person can pay the debts of a friend, so one can consign satisfaction to another believer. The eminent satisfaction of Christ and the superabundant satisfaction of the blessed virgin Mary and the saints form a treasure which the Church guards and administers through indulgences. As I have reported, "all the other saints had the intention in those things which they suffered and did for God that such would be for the well-being not only of themselves, but for the whole Church."³⁴ So if the crusader has endured nothing difficult or dangerous, the grounds for allowing him pardon for sin's punishment without duly performed penitential activity finds its ultimate explanation in the supreme satisfaction which results from Christ's charity.

This explanation develops a theme that Aquinas frequently employs in discussions of Christian redemption. He upholds the principle that one person can satisfy for another; for example, in the Scriptum we find: "unus pro alio satisfacere potest."³⁵ In Second Quodlibetal Question q. 7, a. 2, Aquinas further specifies the grounds for this sort of interchange: "one is able to satisfy for another, if the former intends this."³⁶ We now recognize that the metaphor of the treasure, for example as found in our text, graphically symbolizes the fact that the members of the Church do satisfy for one another. As a result, the Church possesses the ability to oversee and regulate the conditions for this exchange. She indulges those persons who, for whatever reason, have not actually undergone a painful process of spiritual regeneration by themselves. "The reason," writes Aquinas, "why indulgences work remains the unity of the mystical body, in which many perform penitential works beyond the measure of their debts and patiently bear many unjust treatments, through which a multitude of punishments are able to be expiated."³⁷ Although the reason remains implicit in the quodlibetal text, Aquinas holds that Christ's love remains powerful enough to alter what the sinner himself did not have the occasion (or perhaps the will) to do for himself.

Published as: St. Thomas Aquinas on Satisfaction, Indulgences, and Crusades, in: Medieval Philosophy & Theology 2 (1992): 74-96.

Accordingly, the satisfaction of Christ remains the principal source of this thesaurus. In the Second Quodlibetal Question, Aquinas makes the point that the dignity of Christ's personhood accounts for the exceeding value which his sufferings produced in the Church. Of course, this leads us to consider the supreme charity and obedience with which Christ lived his life. In the Summa contra gentiles, for example, we find a complete discussion of these dispositions in Christ. There St Thomas explains the universal benefits of Christ's passion by citing the dignity of the person who suffers, ex dignitate personae patientis, and also by appealing to the charity with which Christ embraced his salvific mission, ex maiori caritate procedens.³⁸ Obviously, these affirmations remains crucial for the present discussion.

To sum up, Aquinas reasons that Christ's heroic love can overcome even the habitual sinner's psychological resistance to godly living. So, the duly indulgenced sinner who dies without undergoing the actual restoration of the divine image is ready for the beatific vision. In another theological opuscula, Collationes super Pater Noster, Aquinas insinuates a reason to explain why this can happen within the mystical body. He affirms "that the Lord strengthens us against temptation by the fervor of charity, because any charity no matter how small can resist sin."³⁹ All in all, the incarnation remains the underlying reason for our spiritual progress and well-being; and this communication of divine goodness can overcome whatsoever indisposition sin may generate in us.

Published as: St. Thomas Aquinas on Satisfaction, Indulgences, and Crusades, in: Medieval Philosophy & Theology 2 (1992): 74-96.

3.3 Replies

According to scholastic practice, the replies to the opening arguments provide Aquinas with an opportunity to supply further clarifications on the topic under discussion. Aquinas addresses each of the four original arguments in turn. The first reply simply asserts the obvious conclusion which a close reading of the stipulations in the papal letter implies. If the condition of the indulgence requires that one actually journey to the Holy land, then Aquinas rejoins: "It should be pointed out that in this last case, the crusader who dies lacks what is most important for an indulgence, namely its necessary condition."⁴⁰

On the other hand, the reply to the second argument clarifies two distinctions which have emerged in the course of the argumentation. The first distinction concerns the offense (culpa) of sin and the punishment (poena) which results from sin. The second distinction points out the difference between mediated divine authority, associated with the sacrament of holy orders, and the power of jurisdiction which, according to the customs of the time, even a non-cleric may exercise. First of all, Aquinas recalls a basic premise of all sacramental theology, namely, that only God exercises the principal agent's causality in a sacramental action.

Ad secundum: It should be noted that only God possesses the authority to forgive sin's guilt. But mediately it also belongs to the priest, insofar as he offers the sacrament of the forgiveness of sins, for example in baptism or penance. Nevertheless an indulgence does not embrace the forgiveness of sin's guilt, since it is not a sacramental reality; thus it belongs not to order but to jurisdiction. For even a non-priest can grant an indulgence if he be commissioned to do so. Therefore, the punishment is totally remitted if the condition is fulfilled, not, however, if it is wanting.⁴¹

Published as: St. Thomas Aquinas on Satisfaction, Indulgences, and Crusades, in: Medieval Philosophy & Theology 2 (1992): 74-96.

Even though other mediators do participate in the divine authority, only God can forgive the actual offense of sin. As we have seen, indulgences only concern sin's punishment. While from a theological point of view sin's punishment directly affects the character of the believer, there still remains a juridical aspect to these punishments. As a theological metaphor, the thesaurus ecclesiae combines this juridical aspect of indulgences with the theological reality of participation in the satisfaction of Christ. Since the Church can regulate the juridical punishments, for example, in prescribing certain works of satisfaction for particular transgressions, the appropriate persons can establish the conditions for allowing a sinner to benefit from the thesaurus ecclesiae. As we have seen, Aquinas considers it especially fitting that, since the Roman Pontiff presides over the universal Church, he alone can establish these conditions.

In the reply to the third argument, Aquinas throws still further light on the important distinction between satisfaction as a juridical act and as a theological reality. In this text, we find the clearest expression of the reason why an indulgence can supply for the actual restoration of one whose life has not been reformed by penitential activity. Aquinas's resolution does not depend here simply on technicalities of language in a papal decree. Again, satisfaction can be considered in two ways: (1) as punitive inasmuch as it belongs to retributive justice and (2) remedial or healing insofar as it forms part of the sacramental system. Strictly speaking then, indulgences supply for satisfaction only in its punitive aspect.

Ad tertium: Satisfaction is both punitive inasmuch as it remains an act of vindicative justice and restorative inasmuch as it is in a certain sense sacramental. An indulgence therefore takes the place of satisfaction insofar as it is punitive: because the punishment which another undergoes is imputed to this one as if he had undergone it, therefore the guilt of punishment is removed. An indulgence does not, however, take the place of satisfaction insofar as it is medicinal, since there still remains the proneness to sinning left from prior sins, the cure of which necessarily entails the work of satisfaction.

Published as: St. Thomas Aquinas on Satisfaction, Indulgences, and Crusades, in: Medieval Philosophy & Theology 2 (1992): 74-96.

Accordingly, the crusader, while he lives, should be counselled not to omit satisfactory works, insofar as they serve to guard against repeated sin, even though the guilt of punishment stands totally removed, nor does this require any labor; for the labor of Christ's passion suffices. For one dying, of course, such prevention is not required, only liberation from the guilt of punishment.⁴²

Clearly, the power of Christ's love works differently in one who is still a member of the Church on earth than it does in one who has died. The need for spiritual discipline and reformation of life implies that the one must continue on as part of the Church on earth, for death marks the end of a person's deliberate involvement in the process of salvation. And since the good works of one individual do not appreciate another's spiritual discipline, Aquinas counsels penance even for the individual who does survive the crusade. Even though the successful completion of the indulgenced work replaces the punitive satisfaction, he still needs to do penance for spiritual growth and maturity.

Satisfactory works in the Church serve a dual purpose. First of all, since sin results in a state of alienation from God which requires redress on the part of the sinner, satisfaction, which Aquinas construes formally as love and obedience and materially as bodily suffering, can restore the relationship. Of course, Aquinas clearly recognizes that the alienation lies in the sinner himself, and not in an injured God. Because the sinner needs to redress the imbalance caused by sinful disorder, theology can still speak about vindicative satisfaction. On the other hand, satisfaction also possesses a therapeutic function. For the sinner willingly undergoes certain exacting exercises which re-order his or her psychological powers towards godly living. Undoubtedly, an indulgence can only satisfy the vindicative aspect of satisfaction. It cannot assure that the beneficiary of the indulgence receives the benefits of spiritual training in virtuous living. But in the event that someone dies, the spiritual communion of the Church insures that the indulgenced soul enjoys passage to the beatific vision without undergoing the ordinary purifications.

The final reply again treats the relationship of an indulgence to the sacramental forum. Aquinas has already indicated that satisfaction possesses a certain (quoddam) sacramental power. Thus, he recognizes that theology can only apply the concept of sacrament to satisfaction, and the indulgence which supplies for it, in an analogical way. Aquinas restates the principle that the priest mediates God's forgiveness for the offense of sin. While a partial forgiveness for only some sins would impugn the totality of loving communion required by divine charity, sacramental absolution nonetheless does leave some of the punishment due for sin intact. On the other hand, an indulgence can remove all of the punishment for sin, as happens in the case of the crusader's indulgence, because of the spiritual authority exercised by the pope.

Published as: St. Thomas Aquinas on Satisfaction, Indulgences, and Crusades, in: Medieval Philosophy & Theology 2 (1992): 74-96.

Ad quartum: The words of the priest saying, "I absolve you from all your sins," do not refer to punishment, but to the offense of sin, for which the priestly office authorizes absolution. Now no one can be absolved from one offense without being absolved from all of them. But punishment can be dismissed either totally or partially. For punishment is dismissed partially by sacramental absolution; totally, however, by the spiritual grace of an indulgence: as the Lord himself says (John 8: 11) to the adulterous woman: "I do not condemn you; go, and sin no more."⁴³

It is significant to observe that in his De regimine principum, Aquinas even identifies this ecclesial authority with the very primacy of Christ headship over the Church.⁴⁴ In this text, St Thomas's personalist orientation embraces the New Testament teaching on the divine authority which Christ communicates to Peter and his successors.

The citation from the Gospel of John, which brings the article to a conclusion, both intimates Aquinas's evangelical outlook and inspires his procedure in the whole discussion. According to the Gospel account, Jesus speaks to the adulterous woman the words which form the basis for the ministry of reconciliation in the Church: "Neither do I condemn you; go, and do not sin again." In his commentary on this passage of the Gospel, Aquinas points out that Christ shows himself to be both a lover of justice as well as a dispenser of mercy. To be sure, he forgives the woman her sin. However, he also instructs her to use this experience as an opportunity to grow in virtue.⁴⁵ In effect, this reflects Aquinas's principal concern in developing a theology of indulgences. We find a remarkable phrase in the third reply which seems to suggest that indulgenced pardon for sin is not burdensome because "the labor of Christ's sufferings suffices." In this way, Aquinas brings the discussion back to its proper christological center which he fully recognizes must ground any theology of indulgences.

Published as: St. Thomas Aquinas on Satisfaction, Indulgences, and Crusades, in: Medieval Philosophy & Theology 2 (1992): 74-96.

IV. Conclusion

To sum up, this quodlibetal question serves as a good example of the distinguished theological craftsmanship which Aquinas had achieved by the time he began his second teaching assignment at Paris. The question of penitential satisfaction occupied theological investigation since the end of the 11th century when Anselm of Canterbury finished his celebrated Cur Deus Homo? Although some authors slight his singular achievement in this area, St Thomas Aquinas makes a significant contribution to the transformation and revitalization of the concept of Christian satisfaction.

Aquinas's theology of indulgences clearly represents his seasoned theological insight. In his mature years, Aquinas recasts the institution known as indulgences by emphasizing how they form part of the God-man relationship. At the same time, he illustrates the central role that Christ and his intention plays in the actual life of the believer. Aquinas explains all human effort within the Church as a result of Christ's capacity to communicate the effects of his own sufferings to his members: "quia sufficit labor passionis Christi." In Aquinas's personalist theological perspective, the mystery of God's love draws all men and women to himself. Because the Church is a communion of charity and belief, indulgences form a valid expression of the unity and grace which marks the visible reality of the Christ's Body. As a matter of fact, Aquinas's teaching on indulgences continues a primitive intuition expressed by St Cyprian in his Treatise on the Lord's Prayer:

"We do not say 'My Father, who art in heaven,' nor 'Give me this day my daily bread.' It is not for himself alone that each person asks to be forgiven, not to be led into temptation or to be delivered from evil. Rather, we pray in public as a community, and not for one individual but for all. For the people of God are all one."⁴⁶

A similar ecclesiological vision undergirds Aquinas's views on indulgences.

NOTES

1. For further information on the historical development of indulgences, see Bernhard Poschmann, Der Ablass im Licht der Bussgeschichte (Bonn: Peter Hanstein Verlag, 1948).
2. For example, Nikolaus Paulus, Indulgences as a Social Factor in the Middle Ages, trans. J. Elliot Ross (New York: The Devin-Adair Company, 1922) illustrates how the Church related indulgences to various aspects of ecclesial communion, e.g., "Indulgences for Ecclesiastical and Charitable Objects" and "Indulgences for Socially Useful Temporal Objects."
3. Peter of Bergamo's tabulation, In Opera Sancti Thomae Aquinatis Index seu Tabula Aurea Eximii Doctoris (Rome: Editiones Paulinae, n.d.), distributes the thirty subjects related to indulgences under four headings: (1) In communi; (2) Ecclesiae; (3) Agens; (4) Quibus. The Index Thomisticus shows that the vast majority of this material occurs in the Fourth Book of Aquinas's Scriptum super libros Sententiarum.
4. See Summa theologiae, Supplementum, q. 25, "De indulgentia secundum se;" q. 26, "De his qui possunt indulgentias facere;" q. 27, "De his quibus valent indulgentiae." James A. Weisheipl, O.P., Friar Thomas d'Aquino with Corrigenda and Addenda (Washington, D.C.: The Catholic University of America Press, 1983), 362, explains that "the Supplement, intended to complete the Summa, is 'put together with scissors and paste from pieces cut out of Aquinas's writings on the Sentences (especially Bk. 4).'"
5. For example, R.-A. Gauthier, "La date du Commentaire de saint Thomas sur l'Ethique à Nicomaque," Recherches de Théologie ancienne et médiévale 18 (1951), p. 103, n. 91, argues that during the Second Parisian Regency, Aquinas was induced to "mitigate the excessive intellectualism that he had earlier displayed." Also see, Santiago Ramirez, De hominis beatitudine III (Madrid,

Published as: St. Thomas Aquinas on Satisfaction, Indulgences, and Crusades, in: Medieval Philosophy & Theology 2 (1992): 74-96.

1947), p. 192.

6. See my The Godly Image. Christ and Salvation in Catholic Thought from Anselm to Aquinas, Studies in Historical Theology VI (Petersham, MA: St. Bede's Publication's, 1990) for an interpretation of Aquinas's texts on soteriology and Christian satisfaction.

7. Question eight of the Second Quodlibet contains two articles, each of which treats the forgiveness of sins. Article one asks whether the sin against the Holy Spirit remains unforgiveable. Article two carries the title: "Utrum cruce signatus qui moritur antequam iter arripiat transmarinum, plenam habeat peccatorum remissionem?" Sandra Edwards provides an English translation of Quodlibetal Questions 1 and 2 in Medieval Sources in Translation, 27 (Toronto: Pontifical Institute of Medieval Studies, 1983). I have consulted this work for my own translation. The author also gives a general introduction to this literary genre and the issues discussed in the two questions.

8. Carl J. Peter, "The Church's Treasures (Thesauri Ecclesiae) Then and Now," Theological Studies 47 (1986), 251-272 examines the history and contemporary significance of this concept.

9. To be sure, we have examples where Aquinas's language lends itself to such an interpretation, as when he suggests in the Fifth Quodlibet, q. 7, a. 2 that meritorious deeds can remain with us quasi apud Deum deposita, but the context clearly indicates that the Vulgate text itself, for example, at II Timothy 1: 12: "Scio enim cui credidi, et certus sum quia potens est depositum meum servare in illum diem," suggests the idiom.

10. The 12th-century Latin term is crucesignatus. In addition to DuCange, "Qui sacrae Crucis militiae nomen dabant," Vol. 2: 1175-76, see J. F. Niermeyer, Mediae Latinitatis Lexicon Minus (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1976), who translates "crucesignatus" as "croisé" in French and "crusader" in English. Although it could be argued that, given the terms of the theological discussion in article 2, a crusader who has taken the vow remains a crusader-designate until he actually completes the

Published as: St. Thomas Aquinas on Satisfaction, Indulgences, and Crusades, in: Medieval Philosophy & Theology 2 (1992): 74-96.

Crusade, I have kept the term crusader throughout. Maureen Purcell, O.P., Papal Crusading Policy. The Chief Instruments of Papal Crusading Policy and Crusade to the Holy Land from the final loss of Jerusalem to the fall of Acre. 1244 - 1291. Studies in the History of Christian Thought, ed. Heiko A. Oberman (Leiden: E.J. Brill, 1975), p. 5, n. 4, also takes account of the special meaning of "crucesignatus." For more information on the history and significance of the term crucesignatus, see Michael Markowski, "Crucesignatus: Its Origin and Early Useage," Journal of Medieval History 10 (1984), 157-65.

11. Nikolaus Paulus, Indulgences as a Social Factor, 62 ff. includes the crusades among other worthy enterprises which the Church promoted through the granting of indulgences. For a comprehensive study of the relationship of indulgences to crusading, see Jonathan Riley-Smith, The First Crusade and the idea of crusading (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1986), esp. c. 1 "Pope Urban's Message."

12. Cf. J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova, et amplissima collectio, 31 vols, Florence and Venice, 1759-1798, Vol. XX: 816. The actual words quoted are: "iter pro omni paenitentia reputetur." For a detailed analysis of the documentation concerning Pope Urban's famous speech at Clermont on November 27, 1095, see James A. Brundage, Medieval Canon Law and the Crusader (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1969), 30ff.

13. Purcell, Papal Crusading Policy, 36. For the text of Ad liberandam Terram Sanctam of IV Lateran, see Antonio García y García, Constitutiones Concilii quarti Lateranensis una cum Commentariis glossatorum, Monumenta Iuris Canonici, Series A: Corpus Glossatorum, Vol. 2 (Città del Vaticano, 1981), 110-118: "plenam suorum concedimus ueniam peccatorum."

14. Generally speaking, before Albert the Great (c. 1200-1280) indulgences were considered above all a commutation of poena, but afterwards theologians came to define them as a remission pure and simple. See Albert's Scripta Super IV Libros Sententiarum IV, d. 20, E, a. 16: "Dicendum, quod diffinitiones datae satis possunt sustineri. Si quis tamen hanc dare vellet, scilicet quod 'indulgentia sive relaxatio est remissio poenae injunctae ex vi clavium, et thesauro supererogationis perfectorum procedens:' puto, quod melius diffiniret." Albert completed this work before 1249. On the whole question of what indulgences were commonly understood to mean, see Hans Eberhard Mayer's The Crusades, 2nd ed. (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1988), 293-295, n. 15.

Published as: St. Thomas Aquinas on Satisfaction, Indulgences, and Crusades, in: Medieval Philosophy & Theology 2 (1992): 74-96.

15. Summa theologiae III, q. 90, a. 2: "Sic igitur requiritur ex parte poenitentis, primo quidem voluntas recompensandi, quod fit per contritionem; secundo quod se subjiciat arbitrio sacerdotis loco Dei, quod fit in confessione; tertio quod recompenset secundum arbitrium ministri Dei, quod fit in satisfactione. Et ideo contritio, confessio et satisfactio ponuntur partes Poenitentiae." In addition, see Bernhard Poschmann, Der Ablass, esp., "Die bussgeschichtlichen und busstheologischen Voraussetzungen des Ablasses," 36ff.

16. Scriptum super libros Sententiarum IV, d. 20, q. 1, a. 3: "Utrum per indulgentiam possit aliquid remitti de poena satisfactoria;" a. 4: "Utrum quilibet sacerdos parochialis possit indulgentiam dare;" a. 5: "Utrum indulgentia valeat existentibus in peccato mortali." All in all, Book IV devotes nine distinctions to the sacrament of penance. The quaestio unica of the 20th distinction includes two other articles on the effects of sin in the life of the believer, namely, a. 1: "Utrum aliquis in extremo vitae suae poenitere possit" and a. 2: "Utrum poena temporalis, cujus reatus post poenitentiam manet, taxetur secundum quantitatem culpae." For an historical study of indulgences during the early scholastic period, see Nikolaus Paulus, "Die Ablasslehre der Frühscholastik," Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 34 (1910), 433ff.

17. P. Glorieux, La littérature quodlibétique de 1260 à 1320, I (Kain, 1925), II (Paris, 1935), 9-50. For a fuller discussion of Aquinas's use of the quodlibetal questions, see Leonard E. Boyle, O.P., "The Quodlibets of St. Thomas and Pastoral Care," The Thomist 38 (1974), 232-256.

18. The exact dating of the Quaestiones de quodlibet I-XII remains a matter of dispute among scholars. See Weisheipl, Friar Thomas D'Aquino, 367-68. Also, Boyle, "The Quodlibets of St. Thomas," gives a summary of the different opinions concerning the dating of the quodlibetal questions. Sandra Edwards, Quodlibetal, follows Weisheipl and Boyle, see especially, 5-10.

Published as: St. Thomas Aquinas on Satisfaction, Indulgences, and Crusades, in: Medieval Philosophy & Theology 2 (1992): 74-96.

19. For example, Guglielmo di Tocco, Hystoria beati Thomae de Aquino, n. 36 records concerning Aquinas: ". . . unde de illustri rege Franciae S. Ludovico dicitur, quod semper in rebus arduis dicti Doctoris requirebat consilium, quod frequenter expertus fuerat esse certum: ut utriusque in hoc perpenderetur sanctitas, et illustris regis in dubiis Doctorem consulendum requireret et sancti Doctoris, qui divino doctus Spiritu, quod esset utilius, responderet."

20. F. Pelster, "Literarische Probleme der Quodlibeta des hl. Thomas von Aquin," in Gregorianum 28 (1947), 78-100; 29 (1948), 62-87, especially, 63-69.

21. See García y García, Constitutiones, p. 117.

22. See the text in Conciliorum oecumenicorum decreta, ed. J. Alberigo et al. (Freiburg-i-B.: Herder, 1962), 273-77; 285-90. Purcell, Papal Crusading, 187-199 also reproduces the decrees of 1245 and 1274. The single extant version of Zelus fidei was first published by H. Fincke, "Constitutiones pro zelo fidei" in Konzilienstudien zur Geschichte des 13 Jahrhunderts (Munster, 1891).

23. 1. Ad hoc enim quod indulgentia alicui valeat, requiritur quod sit vere poenitens et confessus, ut continetur in littera papali. Sed cruce signatus decedens ante iter assumptum, habet haec omnia quae requiruntur secundum formam litterae ad percipiendam plenam indulgentiam peccatorum. Ergo plene percipit eam.

2. Praeterea, solum Deus remittit peccatum quantum ad culpam. Cum ergo Papa dat indulgentiam omnium peccatorum, hoc non referendum ad culpam, sed ad universitatem poenarum. Ille ergo qui accipit crucem secundum formam litterae papalis, nullam poenam patietur pro suis peccatis; et sic statim evolabit, plenam remissionem peccatorum consecutus.

Published as: St. Thomas Aquinas on Satisfaction, Indulgences, and Crusades, in: Medieval Philosophy & Theology 2 (1992): 74–96.

24. Sed contra. 1. Augustinus dicit in XV de Trinit. quod non est idem abstrahere telum, et sanare vulnus: telum enim peccati abstrahitur per remissionem peccati; vulnus autem sanatur per reformationem imaginis, quae quidem fit per opera satisfactionis. Sed cruce signatus decedens ante iter arreptum, nullum laborem sustinuit ad reformationem imaginis. Ergo nondum est sanatum vulnus; et sic non poterit ad gloriam statim pervenire antequam poenas purgatorii patiat.

2. Praeterea, quilibet sacerdos utitur talibus verbis: Ego absolvo te ab omnibus peccatis tuis. Si ergo cruce signatus decedens evolaret, pari ratione quilibet alius a quoque sacerdote absolutus; quod est inconveniens.

25. Dicendum, quod ad evidentiam huius questionis, sicut supra dictum est, opus unius potest esse satisfactorium pro alio, ad quem per intentionem facientis refertur.

Christus autem pro Ecclesia sua sanguinem suum fudit, et multa alia fecit et sustinuit, quorum aestimatio est infiniti valoris, propter dignitatem personae: unde dicitur Sapient. VII, v. 14, quod infinitus est in illa thesaurus hominibus. Similiter et omnes alii sancti intentionem habuerunt in his quae passi sunt et fecerunt propter Deum, ut hoc esset ad utilitatem non solum sui, sed etiam totius Ecclesiae.

26. Totus ergo iste thesaurus est in dispensatione eius qui praeest generali Ecclesiae; unde Petro Dominus claves regni caelorum commisit, Matt., XVI, [19]. Quando ergo utilitas vel necessitas ipsius Ecclesiae hoc exposcit, potest ille qui praeest Ecclesiae de ista infinitate thesauri communicare alicui qui per caritatem fit membrum Ecclesiae de praedicto thesauro quantum sibi visum fuerit oportunitate, vel usque ad totalem remissionem poenarum, vel usque ad aliquam certam quantitatem; ita scilicet quod passio Christi et aliorum sanctorum ei imputetur ac si ipse passus esset quantum sufficeret ad remissionem sui peccati, sicut contingit cum unus pro alio satisfacit, ut dictum est.

27. For instance, see Aquinas's discussion of this point in Summa theologiae III q. 49, a. 1. Also see, Cessario, The Godly Image, 159ff.

Published as: St. Thomas Aquinas on Satisfaction, Indulgences, and Crusades, in: Medieval Philosophy & Theology 2 (1992): 74-96.

28. In Quodlibetum Secundum, q. 7, a. 2, Aquinas is explaining why the prayer of one can benefit another, and he affirms: ". . . omnes qui sunt in caritate, sunt quasi unum corpus; et ita bonum unius redundat in omnes, sicut manus deservit toti corpori, et similiter quodlibet corporis membrum." Furthermore, Aquinas refers back to this explanation in the text of q. 8, a. 2.

29. Ad hoc ergo quod indulgentia alicui valeat, tria requiruntur.

Primo causa pertinens ad honorem Dei, vel ad necessitatem aut utilitatem Ecclesiae. Secundo, auctoritas in eo qui facit: Papa enim potest principaliter, alii vero in quantum potestatem ab eo accipiunt vel ordinariam, vel commissam seu delegatam. Tertio requiritur ut sit in statu caritatis ille qui indulgentiam percipere vult.

Et haec tria designantur in littera papali. Nam causa conveniens designatur in hoc quod praemittitur de subsidio Terrae sanctae; auctoritas vero in hoc quod fit mentio de auctoritate apostolorum Petri et Pauli, et ipsius Papae; caritas autem recipientis, in hoc quod dicitur: Omnibus vere poenitentibus et confessis. Non dicit et satisfaciendis: quia indulgentia non excusat a contritione et confessione, sed cedit in locum satisfactionis.

30. For a discussion of poena and culpa in the work of the canonists, see Stephan Kuttner, Kanonistische Schuldlehre, Studi e testi, vol. 64 (Vatican City, 1935).

31. Est ergo dicendum in quaestione proposita, quod si secundum formam papalis litterae indulgentia concedatur accipientibus crucem in subsidium Terrae sanctae, cruce signatus statim habet indulgentiam, etiamsi decedat antequam iter arripiat: quia sic causa indulgentiae erit non iter, sed votum itineris. Si autem in forma litterae contineatur quod indulgentia detur his qui transierint ultra mare; ille qui decedit antequam transeat, non habet indulgentiae causam.

32. Quaestiones quodlibetales V, q. 7, a. 2, c.: "Manifestum est autem, quod ille qui moritur in redeundo de ultra mare, ceteris paribus, cum pluribus meritis moritur quam ille qui moritur in eundo: habet enim meritum ex assumptione itineris, et ulterius ex prosecutione, in qua forte multa gravia est passus. Et ideo, ceteris paribus, melius moritur ille qui moritur redeundo; quamvis ire sit magis meritorium quam redire, genus operis considerando."

Published as: St. Thomas Aquinas on Satisfaction, Indulgences, and Crusades, in: Medieval Philosophy & Theology 2 (1992): 74-96.

33. Scriptum super libros Sententiarum IV, d. 45, q. 2, a. 2, quaes. 2, ad 3um: "...[P]urgatio animae per poenas purgatorii non est aliud quam expiatio reatus impediens a perceptione gloriae. . ."

34. See supra, note 25.

35. Scriptum super libros Sententiarum IV, d. 20, q. 1, a. 2, quaestiunc. 3. In this instance, however, St. Thomas makes a distinction between satisfaction and merit. In the latter case, as Summa theologiae Ia-IIae, q. 114, a. 6 clearly teaches, no one can merit grace for someone else in strict equivalence (ex condigno) except Christ alone.

36. Quodlibetum Secundum, q. 7, a. 2: ". . . sed secundo modo opus unius valet alteri per modum satisfactionis, prout unus pro altero satisfacere potest, si hoc intendat."

37. Scriptum super libros Sententiarum IV, d. 20, q. 1, a. 3, c.: "Ratio autem quare valere possunt, est unitas corporis mystici, in qua multi operibus poenitentiae supererogaverunt ad mensuram debitorum suorum et multas etiam tribulationes injuste sustinuerunt, per quas multitudo poenarum poterat expiari. . ."

38. See Summa contra gentiles IV, c. 55.

39. Collationes super Pater Noster, Petitio 6 [1100]: "Regit autem hominem ne inducatur in tentationem per fervorem caritatis: quia quaelibet caritas quantumcumque parva, potest resistere cuilibet peccato." Aquinas gave these Lenten sermons in Naples, 1273. Earlier (c. 1270) in the Summa theologiae Ia-IIae, q. 114, a. 6, he makes a similar point: "Sed anima Christi mota est a Deo per gratiam, non solum ut ipse perveniret ad gloriam vitae aeternae, sed etiam ut alios in eam adduceret, in quantum est caput Ecclesiae et auctor salutis humanae, secundum illud ad Heb., Qui multos filios in gloriam adduxerat, auctorem salutis etc."

Published as: St. Thomas Aquinas on Satisfaction, Indulgences, and Crusades, in: Medieval Philosophy & Theology 2 (1992): 74-96.

40. "Ad primum ergo dicendum, quod in hoc ultimo casu deficit in cruce signato decedente illud quod est principalius, scilicet indulgentiam causa."

41. "Ad secundum ergo dicendum, quod per auctoritatem solus Deus culpam remittit, sed ministerio etiam sacerdos, in quantum exhibet sacramentum passionis peccati, puta in baptismo vel poenitentia. Et tamen indulgentia non se extendit ad remissionem culpae, quia non est sacramentalis, unde non sequitur ordinem, sed jurisdictionem; potest enim et non sacerdos indulgentiam concedere, si sit ei commissum. Et ideo poena totaliter remittitur si causa subsit, non autem si causa desit."

42. Ad tertium dicendum, quod satisfactio et est punitiva in quantum est actus vindicativae justitiae, et est etiam medicativa, in quantum est quoddam sacramentale. Indulgentia ergo supplet locum satisfactionis in quantum est punitiva: quia scilicet poena quam alius sustinuit, imputatur isti ac si ipse sustinuisset, et ideo reatus poenae tollitur; sed non succedit in locum satisfactionis in quantum est medicativa, quia adhuc remanent pronitates ad peccandum derelictae ex priori peccato, ad quas sanandas necessarius est labor satisfactionis.

Et ideo cruce signatus, dum vivunt, consulendum est ut non praetermittant satisfactoria opera, in quantum sunt praeservativa a peccatis futuris, licet reatus poenae sit totaliter solutus nec ad hoc requiritur aliquis labor; quia sufficit labor passionis Christi. Morientibus autem non est necessaria huiusmodi praeservatio, sed solum liberatio a reatu poenae.

43. Ad quartum dicendum, quod verbum sacerdotis dicentis, Absolve te ab omnibus peccatis tuis, non refertur ad poenam, sed ad culpam, cuius absolutioni ministerium impendit. Non potest autem aliquis absolvi ab una culpa quin absolvatur ab omnibus. Poena vero potest totaliter dimitti vel particulariter. Particulariter quidem in absolutione sacramentali poena dimittitur; totaliter vero in spirituali gratia indulgentiae: sicut enim Dominus dicit Joan. VIII, 11, mulieri adulterae: 'Non te condemnabo: vade, et amplius noli peccare.'

44. De regimine principum, Bk. 3, c. 10 [980]: "Cum enim summus Pontifex sit caput in corpore

Published as: St. Thomas Aquinas on Satisfaction, Indulgences, and Crusades, in: Medieval Philosophy & Theology 2 (1992): 74-96.

mystico omnium fidelium Christi, et a capite sit omnis motus et sensus in corpore vero; sic erit in proposito. Propter quod oportet dicere in summo Pontifice esse plenitudinem omnium gratiarum, quia ipse solus confert plenam indulgentiam omnium peccatorum, ut compleat sibi quod de primo principe Domino dicamus, quia de plenitudine eius nos omnes accepimus."

45. See In Evangelium B. Joannis Expositio, c. 8, l. 1, no. 6: "Sed Dominus culpam non amans, peccatis non favens, ipsam damnavit culpam, non naturam, dicens, Amplius noli peccare: ut sic appareat quam dulcis est Dominus per mansuetudinem, et rectus per veritatem."

46. De dominica oratione, No. 8: "non dicimus: pater meus, qui es in caelis nec: panem meum da mihi hodie, nec dimitti sibi tantum unusquisque debitum postulat aut ut in temptationem non inducatur adque a malo liberetur pro se solo rogat. publica est nobis et communis oratio, et quando oramus, non pro uno sed pro populo toto oramus, quia totus populus unum sumus" (Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum Vol. 3, Pars 1, 271).

Published as: St. Thomas Aquinas on Satisfaction, Indulgences, and Crusades, in: Medieval Philosophy & Theology 2 (1992): 74-96.